From the Oberlin Student's Monthly of Feb., 1859. SOUL SIGNS.

As the wind barp sings the changes As the wind barp sings the changes
Of the ever-varying wind,
So the voice betrays the feelings
Passing through the human mind;
Loud, when a sessions dark and bitter,
In their tempest forceness roll,
Descerating inner alters—
Through the deep depths of the soul.

Sad and low, when white-hurd sorrow Takes the place of blissful things,
That have civered our snow white winters,
And made glad our flower-crowned springs
Soft and sweet, when words of kindness Fall upon the mourner's ear, Drawing often times the angels From their blessed homes to hear.

Calm and holy, when Religion
Stands high priest within the soul,
Changing not its rich-toned key-note.
Though around the wild storms roll.
Eloquent, when high as, trings,
Like the skylark, heavenward go; By the accents of these soul-tones, It is ours the soul to know.

And the soul looks out from faces-With the things beyond the skies.
On the brow is sisniped the impress.
If a faith sublime and deep
Points the road that leads to heaven,
And the teet that lighway keep.

If we drink from Truth's Great Fountain, Round the brow a halo lies, Of a steady, lustrous shining, Visible to angel eyes. And this halo throws a brightness

O'er the face that mortals see, As the golden beams of sunshine Rest upon the grassy len. If with Christ we suffer anguish-It a crown of thorns we wear-

it up Calvary's rugged pathway,
It is ours the cross to bear;

If we do it nouly, bravely,
With the falth of Him who died,— Through the face will shine the glory Perfect peace oft lies on faces, Where such souls have sought their rest

As the sun leaves, in its setting, Clouds of glory in the west. If the soul be all illumined; By the hand of God divine, Holines, and love, and mercy, Will above its features shine.

But, if ain rests on the altar,
When the lamp light we should place.
Nought but doubt, and gloom, and anguish,
Will be written on the face. We can have our faces manifed With a calm, celestial light, Or reflect the mystic shadows Of a dark, terrestrial night.

One will tell of Joy's baptism, One betray despair and wee — By these soul-lights, and soul-shadows, It is ours the soul to know. And the soul too gives the motion— Slow and heavy, when within Lies a heavy weight of anguish, From the burden of a sin.

Light and fleetly tripping footsteps
Mark the spirit glad and gay:
All subdued and trembling are these,
Pointing out the mourner's way.
By a noble, high expression,
By a calm and holy mien,
By a voice of flate-like music,
Is a perfect, true soul seen.

Ever where these truly mingle,
Ifarmony of life is found.
Which will send its heaven taught music
As a flower its fragrance round.
And this harmony will follow,
As a blessing freely given,
If we strive to tune the life-harp For the minstrelsy of heaven.

And the soul will give forth music Such as God will love to hear -Such as angels and archangels
Bend to catch with listening e-r. Thus will life have played its sole Here upon the shores of time, To the grand and glorious music Of eternal truths sublime.
